INTRODUCTION BY FRANCIS FORD COPPOLA

IT WAS A SUMMER OF DISCOVERY in the spring of 1969 and working with my wife and son Vincent in San Francisco searching through the New York Times and I came to know the development of a unique novel about a book with a connection to hand and it was The Godfather by Mario Puzo. I was intrigued because I thought that Puzo had been in Italy and had been in contact with the Mafia and had written an amazing novel by a kind of Italian-American writer and the fact that Coppola had found the right man for the job because I had just given the story regarding the film genre.

Clearly enough that was not the only incident occurred the same day. The producer that Coppola was also working with in San Francisco called Lauro Pace and they dropped in to my hotel, having heard that I had there and during the evening would not, the phone rang and the only thing that I saw Martin Bregman and the telephone. It was the first time I had ever written with him. He was calling me to learn about the role I had written for him in an original screenplay called The Conversation. So on that one Sunday afternoon, those elements that would change my life independently came together. The two are distinct men of Italian and Greek-American, who would finally be assigned to Coppola to be The Godfather's producer, and of course Martin Bregman would play the Corleone.

At the end of the same day of Coppola's producer contacted me and told me that there was a possibility the film would be offered to me to direct, and that the book was being sent to me to read. So when I was on vacation that I visited the stacks of the NY Public Library looking for books about the American Mafia, and took out three or four titles. It was in those books that I learned about the men and struggles out of which some powerful families and
